Taylor's targeted victims include male and female teenage victims - including acquaintances and a stranger. He was convicted in 2005 of second-degree sexual assault of a child. Other sexually related convictions include:

- Contribute to Delinquency of a Minor, 1984

Since 1994, the state has had the ability to ask a court to order a convicted sex offender into inpatient treatment managed by the Department of Health Services. This request comes as the sex offender is completing their prison term and is on the verge of being released to the community. The sex offender is committed if they have been convicted of certain crimes and have a mental disorder that makes them more likely than not to engage in acts of sexual violence

Individuals committed to treatment at Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center have the opportunity to petition their committing court for release every 12 months. If the court determines an individual has reached a point in their treatment in which they are no longer more likely than not to reoffend, the court orders either community living on supervised release or discharge with no supervision from the Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center.

Taylor is being released without supervision; he has indicated that he will be homeless upon release. He is required to be Wisconsin Sex Offender Registry for life and will be on GPS monitoring for life.
